Market Update

Australia's S&P/ASX 200 retreated 3 percent, while New Zealand's S&P/NZX 50 also finished the month slightly lower.

The weakness in the S&P/ASX 200 was driven primarily by Financials, which fell 7 percent. Information Technology performed even more poorly, sliding 12 percent. By contrast, Health Care and Consumer Staples were relative bright spots, each advancing 2 percent.

For the month, low volatility as a factor stood out as the only index to deliver a positive return. Growth and Momentum factors, however, were among the weakest performers.

Chinese equities dipped in November as early-month gains faded. Weak manufacturing and services data, ongoing property-sector strain, and softer domestic demand weighed on market sentiment.

The S&P500 finished muted for the month up 0.13%. Sector performance among large-caps was mixed. Health Care delivered an exceptional 9 percent return. Information Technology fell 4 percent amid renewed worries about an AI-driven valuation bubble, although it recovered strongly toward month end.

Mid and small-capitalisation stocks outperformed, with midcaps rising 2 percent and smallcaps gaining 3 percent.

Factor performance shifted from the previous month, with Low Volatility and Dividend strategies outperforming High Beta, while Value led Growth.

Europe delivered a subdued but positive outcome in November, edging up 1 percent. Health Care stood out as the strongest performing sector, rising 6 percent over the month. At the opposite end, Information Technology declined 4 percent as concerns about stretched valuations weighed on sentiment.

Fixed income markets generally remained under pressure. After leaving the cash rate unchanged in early November, the Reserve Bank of Australia is now viewed as more likely to tighten than ease, particularly following stronger than expected inflation data.

Most major fixed income indices advanced. U.S. Treasuries firmed as markets priced in a higher likelihood of rate cuts, with the 10-year yield dipping below 4 percent.

Crude oil, fell 4 percent, while gold continued its strong run, rising a further 5 percent to take its year to date gain to 57 percent.
